A protection and safety specialist

A protection and safety specialist's job is to make sure that buildings, valuables or people are safe and secure. Many jobs involve dealing with people a lot of the time. Others are more technical, working with the latest technology in security systems. To do this job, people need to be:

- mature, responsible and honest
- healthy and physically fit
- able to use their initiative and make quick decisions.

Protection and safety specialists often work long hours and many do quite a bit of overtime. The work may be in the day or at night, and shift work is very common. There are many different kinds of places where protection and safety specialists work - indoors or outdoors.

Some people move into security work when they are a bit older, and it can help a lot to have previous work experience, especially in the police, fire or prison services or the armed forces. Exam passes are not always needed. They will sometimes get extra training to learn new skills such as dog handling or using new technology.

Protection and safety specialists can work in all kinds of large organisations, from hotels, hospitals, factories and offices to building sites, colleges, shopping centres, airports and ships. Growing numbers of protection and specialists are needed all over the country.
